PETER A. ALLARD SCHOOL OF LAW GUIDELINES FOR DIRECTED RESEARCH COURSES

Directed Research courses offer graduate students an opportunity to do extensive research and writing on a topic of their choice.

In order to register in a Directed Research, the student and supervising instructor (who must be a regular faculty member, not an Adjunct Professor) must complete and return a Directed Research Authorization Form.

Subject to the approval of the Associate Dean, Graduate Studies and Professional Programs, graduate students may enroll in Directed Research courses of 2, 3, or 4 credits. Most one-term Directed Research Projects are 3 credits. Students seeking approval for a 4 credit project should provide an explanation of why the project requires 4 credits.

Students in the LLM programs are normally allowed to complete a maximum of 4 credits toward their required credit-work as directed research courses. Students in the LLM and PhD programs should consult with their thesis supervisor before applying to take a directed research project.

The supervising faculty member will set the requirements for the course, in consultation with the student before accepting the supervision. For the guidance of students and faculty members, the general expectations of directed study courses are:

- that the student and supervising faculty member will meet twice per month;
- that the student will provide the supervising faculty member with an outline and draft of the research paper at appropriate intervals;
- that the supervising faculty member will provide appropriate feedback; and
- that the final paper will be approximately 2500 words/credit (excluding bibliography).

Students may not receive Directed Research credit for work done as part of paid employment.

Faculty members are not obliged to take on Directed Research students.

Multiple Directed Research papers under the supervision of the same professor are not encouraged.
